On Day of Empathy, Lawmakers and Advocates Say Michigan Needs More Criminal Justice Reform

Talks on voter rights, bail, juvenile life, incarcerated women highlight day

LANSING — State legislators, formerly incarcerated people and advocates came together Tuesday for the 2022 Day of Empathy at the Michigan State Capitol to talk about some of the most pressing criminal justice reform issues facing the state, including the need for bail reform, a proposal to end juvenile life without parole sentencing, voting rights for formerly incarcerated people and specific concerns facing women at the Huron Valley Women’s Correctional Facility. The Day of Empathy, sponsored nationally by Dream Corps Justice and hosted at the state-level by Safe & Just Michigan, is a day to inform people about the need for criminal justice reform while highlighting the humanity of people who have been involved with the criminal justice system.

“The last few years have brought changes that opened up opportunities to people with old criminal records, giving them chances at good jobs and safe housing that they had been shut out of for decades,” said Safe & Just Michigan Executive Director John S. Cooper. “But there is still a lot of work to be done. We are still sending juveniles to prison for life and telling them there’s no way they will ever come home, and legally innocent people are losing their liberty and livelihoods because they can’t afford to pay bail. We need to do more work to make our justice system fair to all and our communities safe for everyone.”

Legislation is currently pending for several of these issues, including laws to ban the practice of sentencing juveniles to life without sentencing (Senate Bills 848-851) and a proposal to significantly reform cash bail (House Bills 5436-5443). Both sets of bills are awaiting their first hearings in the Senate Judiciary and Public Safety and the House Judiciary Committee, respectively.

“Michigan has come a long way from the days when residents and lawmakers believed that tough-on-crime laws led to safer communities,” said Safe & Just Michigan Senior Policy Analyst Josh Hoe. “Thankfully, after decades of tough-on-crime laws, a bipartisan majority of legislators in Michigan started to work together to pass legislation that was smart on crime — not just ‘tough.’ Our state is strongest when as many people as possible are able to work, raise families and invest in making their communities safe and strong. But there is still work to do, and the Day of Empathy is about bringing justice-impacted communities together with legislators to continue Michigan’s national leadership in the area of criminal justice.”
This year’s Day of Empathy offered four discussion panels to focus on current issues before the state.
